Homemakers Items

Rural homemakers will soon be facing a familiar problem — what to do with excess milk produced when dairy cows are turned out on lush spring pasture.

Guy J. Nageotte, dairy products specialist at VPI, says that many rural families, which keep one or two dairy cows for the family milk supply, will have more fluid milk than they can use.

Sometimes, excess milk produced by the family cow during the spring months is fed to farm livestock, while at other times of the year the home milk supply is too short to supply the family needs. Nageotte says it is easy to store the excess milk in a variety of forms for use during the months of storage. With careful planning and a little extra effort, a constant supply of food nutrients from milk can be maintained all year long.

Concentrated milk products such as butter, cream, ice cream, cream cheese, and aged cheeses are easily made and stored in the home. There are various ways to store dairy products, Nageotte says. For instance, brine can be used to store butter. Freezers can be used to store butter, cream, ice cream, and cream cheese. Refrigerated areas and cool cellars can be used to store aged cheeses. Detailed information on making and storing dairy products is available from county home demonstration agents, or the Dairy Science Department, VPI, Blacksburg.

Nageotte says the quality of the milk from which dairy products are made for storage is very important. Only fresh, clean, good - flavored milk should be used. Products made from pasteurized milk or cream will keep better. Milk and cream can be pasteurized easily in the home. Pasteurization will destroy 90 to 95% of the bacteria that cause spoilage in raw milk. Two or three days' supply of sweet milk or cream can be accumulated before processing if it is pasteurized.

LIME NEEDS OF VARIOUS SOILS AIM OF CURRENT VIRGINIA TEST

Lime needs of various types of soils found extensively in Virginia are being determined in a study being conducted by the VPI Agricultural Experiment Station.

In the study, 13 "on the farm" rate-of-liming tests were begun in the spring of 1954 and are still in progress. Ground dolomitic limestone of average fineness was applied to plots laid out on private farms. The farmers continue to crop the areas with their normal production practices except that no lime is applied to the experimental areas. Geographically the sites range from the coastal plain, over the Piedmont, and into the limestone valleys of Virginia. Texturally the soils range from light sands to heavy loams.

Regular soil samplings since the test was applied provide a chronological picture of increases in soil pH, as well as increases in available calcium and magnesium. It is apparent that the higher the rate of liming, the faster the pH increase and the higher it goes.

To date in the study, several indications have been noted. Lime is a long-lasting soil improvement. No appreciable decrease in soil pH has occurred after four years. Some of the heavier soils limed at the higher rates are still increasing in pH. To reach the pH recommended for alfalfa, heavier soils need about twice the amount of lime as do lighter soils. Heavier soils contain about twice the amount of available calcium and magnesium as do lighter soils at a given pH level. To raise the pH of an unlimed soil, applying smaller amounts of lime at shorter intervals is probably a better way than applying a large amount in one dose.

In another test at the Experiment Station, agronomists are trying to determine the lime needs for alfalfa on Tatum silt loam, one of the most lime-deficient soils found in Virginia. The benefits of lime at rates from 250 pounds per acre to 16 tons per acre are under study. The test, which has been underway for three years, so far has shown that fertilization, however generous, can not be effectively substituted for lime with alfalfa.

Both yield and longivity of the stand are associated with the level of lime. The researchers have found that 250 pounds of lime will only start growth of alfalfa, 500 pounds will last about one year, and 1/2 ton about two years. They expect that one ton will be effective about three years, two tons for four years, four tons for about six years, eight tons for about eight years, and 16 tons for about 12 years. Slight but consistant superiority of dolomitic limestone over the calcic type has been shown by yield in spite of higher chemical reactivity of the calcic type.

KNOW THE WEATHER

By E. H. Sims

On a cold day why does one not hear the buzz of insects, so common in warmer weather?

Practically all insects die or become dormant when the temperature drops below a certain point. The experts have figured out the exact temperatures at which bees, bugs and other creatures cease all movement.

Bees, for example, will cease their activities at about 50 degrees. If the temperature is less than 50 degrees you will not hear or see a bee then. The exact degree at which other insects and bugs become inactive has been a subject of careful study, which seems to prove that the behavior pattern seldom, if ever, varies.

Nature's laws, then, are better obeyed than most of man's.

Public Appearance

Ashby-de-la Zouch, England.- A fireman tapped on a pretty young wife's bedroom window — but she refused his rescue offer because she had not powdered her nose.

A fire was raging on the ground floor of the building and the fireman, wearing breathing apparatus, had climbed a 40-foot ladder.

Mrs. Flora Colfer, 29, looked at herself in the mirror and told the fireman she preferred to stay upstairs with her husband.

Beating the suffocation problem by leaning out of their window while firemen brought the blaze under control, Mrs. Colfer explained later, "I had been off work with influenza. I wasn't feeling very pretty and hadn't even bothered powder my nose. I wouldn't have that awful ladder. It would have been dignified."
